Essential knowledge

Almost two thousand years ago, Britain was home to various Celtic tribes. Then in AD 43, a Roman invasion led to a major change within society. The Romans wanted Britain's metals, natural resources and even sold many Celtic people into slavery.

Britain then became part of a huge empire ruled from Rome. During this time, the Roman army fought many battles to take control and had to defeat fierce warriors such as Boudicca in her revolt against the invaders. To stop further revolts, Hadrian's wall was built to protect the Romans and to control trade and movement of people. But once the Romans had seized control, they created a lasting impact in Britain that can still be seen today. This is shown in architecture, forts, walls, roads and bath houses that are still evident across England and Wales.

Significant people

Boudicca was a member of a British tribe called the Iceni and lived in a region named East Anglia today. As a warrior queen, she led the Iceni tribe in a rebellion against the Romans but was finally defeated at the battle of Watling Street.

Boudica could not face being captured by the Romans, so she decided to poison herself instead by swallowing a deadly drink.
